Executive Statement from Sheriff Michael Reese

August 2017

This week I heard from a handful of Multnomah County residents expressing concern about "jail inmate labor to assist in the Oregon Department of Transportation's sweeps of homeless encampments." In dealing with neighborhood livability issues at the intersection of public spaces and complex social issues such as homelessness, mental health and addiction, I have learned public safety must focus on much more than just responding to crime. Public safety agencies must be dedicated to the principle that, generally, the most effective approach to many crime and disorder problems is to address them from a human services and public health perspective. At the same time, it must be recognized that public safety agencies bring essential capabilities to a coordinated effort: engagement, peacekeeping, understanding and when necessary, enforcement.

The Multnomah County Sheriff's Office (MCSO) appreciates the opportunity to reaffirm our commitment to neighborhood livability; we routinely hear from neighborhood groups that this is a top public safety priority. The Sheriff's Office is entrusted with a dual mission when it comes to neighborhood livability, which encompasses law enforcement and corrections. We are pleased to collaborate with the Joint Office of Homeless Services, Portland Police Bureau, Gresham Police Department, and a myriad of social service providers. By pooling our resources and coordinating our efforts, we become capable of making a significant difference in our community by maintaining the livability of our neighborhoods and connecting homeless persons with services.

To reduce tensions in our community, we strive to inform the public about our efforts. By collaborating with the Joint Office of Homeless Services, law enforcement units such as MCSO's Homeless Outreach and Program Engagement (HOPE) Team, consistently bring a peacekeeping response to neighborhood and business complaints and address the human services needs of our community. We will continue to engage individuals in need and match persons to appropriate services.
